

Managing contractor safety performance

How to achieve a sustainable cultural transformation together

In 2017, the number of subcontractors went up 1.69% (4.8 billion employed) making the value of subcontracting in Europe 523 billion euros (4.34% increase vs. previous year). An increasing number of international research show that hiring contractors without providing proper safety guidance and support will lead to more accidents. This deterioration, measured through LTI rates, is concerning because the safety performance of a company is closely linked to its overall performance, and is becoming a growing selection criteria for contractors.

While expectations are often set in the consultation phase when it comes to safety performance, experience shows that contractors are rarely involved in their clients' safety culture transformation programmes. The diversity of professions, risk profiles, employees, company sizes and means adds on an extra layer of complexity. Contractors also rarely have the means to carry out these programmes themselves.

From there, it is quite frequent to find a disconnect between the level of performance expected by a client, and the reality of the output. Hence the question: how to reach a sustainable cultural transformation, together? DuPont Sustainable Solutions has built on DuPont's experience in managing thousands of contractors every day, and making it a real lever of performance through integrated cultural approaches and common implementation of management processes.

During the event, we will tackle the challenges and implications of contractor safety management through interactive sessions, testimonials and debates to understand what solutions can be reached collectively to reach higher levels of safety performance.
